

Gender Equality

We step foot into this world as humans, grow up as humans, grow old as humans, and finally die as humans. Everything that happens in between is created by us. Conventionally, we were told that there are only two genders in the world, i.e., female and male. But now we have been educated that there are more than two genders or identities. Gender is a fluid aspect of society. Gender equality is not restricted to one or two genders. In fact, it is not merely a gender issue at all. It is a human rights issue.

Every person in this world deserves to have an individual identity and be respected as that identity. No one should be denied happiness and peace because of their gender. Earlier we used to fight for equal treatment of females and males. But those two are not the only recognised genders anymore.

There is a gender spectrum with many genders which cannot and should not be counted, just like there are a lot of personalities which cannot be counted. Treating every human being equally and respectfully is our duty which should not be compromised in any situation.

If our society wants to truly develop and grow into a better version of itself, it needs to implement gender equality in all forms. Every person should be given equal rights and should not be discriminated or humiliated on the basis of their gender. It will be then and only then, a well-developed society.
